

After listening to Ekaterina Shulman's lecture, I want to say that basically I completely agree with her. For example, with the fact that the formation of a family by established traditions will become a thing of the past. It's sad to realize, but it will become easier for people to survive alone. Of course, I want to note that YouTube and Wikipedia will become one of the main basic signs of the new century. The Internet and social networks will completely capture the future. It is important to note that everyone no longer goes to work in the sense in which it was understood in the 20th century. Accordingly, those with whom they live are becoming more and more important to them. People began to communicate more closely with each other, which makes family ties more valuable and more fragile.

The only thing I disagree with is guaranteed earnings. I don't think that robots, that have replaced humans in production, will create a profitable part of the budget.

The result is such a picture of the future.
